

Access Copyright Quick Info Sheet

Kinds of Copying

The licence provides access to a vast array of copyright material: books, folios, magazines, journals and newspapers. It does not cover works for which the government or your institution holds the copyright, original artistic works, negatives, instruction manuals, newsletters, letters to the editor or advertisements, most print music, workbooks and other consumables. As well, there is an exclusions list of publishers and titles not represented by Access Copyright. The licence does not cover copying of publications on this list.

The licence may also be used to clear copyright for copying onto slides, microfiche, transparencies and into alternate formats for the visually impaired. See the licence for specific provisions.

The licence does not include permission to copy into a computer for storage, networking, or copying.

Copying Limits

The purpose of the licence is to provide access, not to replace buying books and other published materials. For this reason, the licence has limits.

The licence distinguishes between incidental copying for use and copying for sale.

Incidental Copying

Copies made for library reserve and inter-library loan and last minute copies for classroom distribution are authorized under incidental copying. Up to 10% of a publication or an entire essay, poem, article or short story may be copied, whichever is greater. A chapter which is 20% or less of a book may also be copied.

Copying for Sale

The limit is 15%, with some special restrictions on textbooks. Most multiple copying falls under this part of the licence and the bibliographic information must be recorded. Royalties of 7.4 cents are paid to Access Copyright on a per-page, per-copy basis. Copying onto slides, microfiche or into alternate formats for the visually impaired are subject to specific provisions, see the licence for details.

Textbooks

Textbook extracts, when included in course packs, can be no more than 5% of the textbook or a single chapter, whichever is less. There can be no more than two extracts from a textbook written by the same author and published by the same publisher within any five year period. Finally, no more than 50% of the pages in the course pack can be taken from textbooks.

These limits apply to textbooks published for the university and college market only. They do not apply to other kinds of publications – scholarship books, for example.
